The chronic use of several classes of drugs has been linked with the development of primary non-inflammatory motor neuropathies (PMN). These drug-induced motor neuropathies (DIMN) present as distal, symmetric, predominantly sensory and motor polyneuropathy with a benign course. PMN can be triggered by the treatment of several inflammatory conditions, metabolic disorders and by drug administration, and may also occur without other apparent etiologic factors. This article reviews the clinical features, risk factors, and pathogenesis of the most commonly encountered DIMN, which are drug-induced immune-mediated neuropathies (DIMI). The use of immunosuppressants and the newly introduced therapies for the treatment of inflammatory demyelinating diseases are the main triggering factors of DIMI. The development of DIMI typically occurs within 6-12 months after the start of the offending medication. Non-immune-mediated
