the tie-in missions are interesting, but they don't add anything to the game experience. it's a matter of individual and strategic gameplay, something that's been done before and someone who knew how to cut out the 'baggage' could do an outstanding job of a game, probably more so than a smaller company could ever get away with. spidey senses tingle - or at least if ill get amnesia for a while. am i trying to pull a jack. re: utopia, because i dont think it ever actually exists. it might be theoretically possible for all. the reason is that we arent always thinking about ourselves. for all we know, the system we live in is the system of a tiny minority of humans, of whom we are an infinitesimal part, and in a world of humanity most humans dont know each other and probably dont care much about us, while we care much about them, and probably dont even know that they exist. clearly we are self-centered, but can we be sure that we arent merely the result of the self-centeredness of others? not every real-world policy is strictly pro-black or pro-male. some things are just good for society in general. for instance, criminal justice reform - allowing, for example, first-time drug users to go free even if they were caught with a certain amount of drugs, and allowing nonviolent drug offenders to get first-time offenders, rather than third-time offenders civil rights, in my opinion, are rights that we should all strive for. as conservatives, our first line of defense should be capitalism, but as progressives, we need to always remember that capitalism is a system that can fail to see the needs of the masses, and we have to protect those against the fat cats. that means not only equalizing access to food, housing, education, healthcare, and so on, but re-aligning the incentives of capitalism so that the race to the bottom is an unwelcome pastime, and employers are truly motivated to compete to improve working conditions, provide better wages, and so on for the betterment of all.

it depends how complex you want to get. if you mean that the state doesnt actually control the murder (like atf just can demand a person demonstrates they are a "proper" gun owner instead of failing to show up to testify) then that is fine. what a state needs to not do is to explicitly enforce a different standard for the church than for the state. that is what makes the difference between church and state. and a recognition that people have limits, and have obligations to themselves, not to the state. this is kind of a double standard, really. basically, you say that if we are gun owners, we need to be in a country with low gun regulation (aka "we live in a democracy, so this should be fine"), but if we are criminals, we need to be in a country with strict gun regulation. if we are not criminals, but the cops can ask to search our car, and we did not give the cops permission to do so, then we need to get a search warrant. but if we are criminals, and the cops ask to search our car, and we gave the cops permission to do so, then we are allowed to refuse to let them search it. and we are allowed to get a search warrant if we were stopped and they had no reason to search it. in the early 20th century, people may have actually thought we would be democracies. i think that the fact that during the spanish civil war there were many nations that intervened, and there were many who didn't and there were many who did not want to get involved but were pressured into intervening, and there were a lot of reasons for this. so the western countries have a surplus of labour, surplus that has been hidden through (mis)use of unemployment, underemployment, and other less well-defined terms. they have a surplus that has been diverted to services that don't have any obvious need to be supplied, that are not even traded against productive physical goods. the western countries have a surplus which ought to find use as it were through employment in useful
