One of the lesser but still significant drawbacks, however, is that the "Developer" tool is now part of the shareable, smart previews. This has to be a performance issue, since "Developers" are a small percentage for the total number of people using the software. Third-party filters were always one of the most popular requests from the Photoshop community. Its server capabilities concern us less since Adobe has done a good job of providing a repeatable and reliable platform for third-party filters plus a controlled method for sharing custom filters. With these features, Photoshop is demonstrating a commitment to the Photoshop community to provide value beyond Photoshop. An interesting point to note is that Adobe got "bad press" from the community when they developed the tags feature as one of the "basic" features in Photoshop CS5. The developer community tends to be wary of "basic" functionality. From an artistic stand point, it is difficult to present only the good sides. Lightroom 5 has some bugs that could have been fixed. I had to create two sets of slides, just to apply a crop in a different way. If you select the Crop tool and accidentally deselect it, it will stop working and you have to reopen the image to get it back to normal. Crop tool in the 5.1 version was much better. Lightroom 5 also lacks a decent 3D effect, which forces you to use the portal adobe demonstrates on the website. Adobe could add the ability to use and create KTX files. I would love to play with this technology. Also, as an artist, you will soon notice that, despite all of the tools coming with Lightroom 5, the sharpness isn't up to par. These small things may not seem like much but they can be noticeable. One thing that Lightroom 5 should have done, and for which it has now made an advancement, is to implement single-layer blending, which is the latest feature from Photoshop CS 6. This release also enabled the standard “Create Panorama” feature in the new Beta. Thus, Lightroom 5 needlessly forces you to follow in Photoshop’s footsteps instead of being able to use its new version.
